CateCoin (CATE), Explained

Definitely not a circulating dog coin

When something takes off, a slew of copycats will emerge, each one hoping to cash in on the phenomenon's success. This is a common occurrence in the cryptocurrency market, and it has occurred frequently with "meme coins," or cryptocurrencies designed to mimic Dogecoin's success.

When it first launched, Dogecoin (DOGE) was meant to be funny. However, it quickly gained traction, soared in value, and is now a fixture in the cryptocurrency market. Since DOGE's meteoric rise in early 2021, many other cryptocurrencies have tried, and failed, to usurp its position as the dominant meme currency. CateCoin has finally arrived.

Unlike Dogecoin, Shiba Inu, and Floki Inu, CateCoin is not a dog coin. The cat is the official mascot of CateCoin. However, it admits to being a meme currency, and it's safe to argue that it wouldn't exist if not for Dogecoin's commercial success.

Memes and cash?

CateCoin's main selling point is not the cat itself, but rather the fact that it improves upon the concept of meme coins in general. CateCoin is a cryptocurrency that may be used to financially reward people for making memes.

According to the token's white paper, meme creators can upload their creations to the network and begin earning CATE once their memes receive 100 likes and 10 comments. To be considered a meme maker, though, you'll need a bankroll of at least 1,000,000 CATE.

Create non-transferable tokens based on memes you upload to the CateCoin platform and you can make money off of them (NFTs). It's possible to buy, sell, and trade these NFTs on the network, with the inventor receiving a cut of the proceeds. The implementation timeline for the decentralized exchange for NFTs is still in flux. The network also has a play-to-earn game titled Rise Of Cats, which players can participate in for the chance to win real money.

The token economy is based on a supply cap of 100 trillion CATE. 45% will be spent on overhead, 7% will be allocated to liquidity pools, 10% will be allocated to the marketing and team budget, and 5% will be set aside for research and development. CateCoin holders can stake their coins for a 15% annual percentage payout, while network transactions are taxed at 2%.

In July of 2021, the network passed an audit conducted by EtherAuthority.
