What is Green Satoshi Token (GST)?

The STEP� software uses two tokens: the Green Satoshi Token (GST). The second is GMT, which we examined in a piece that was previously published.

The play-to-earn game on STEP� is powered by the Solana token GST. Its primary goal is to incentivize users to lead active, healthy lives in order to accrue tokens for their efforts. It is one of the two STEP� ecosystem tokens. The STEP� software makes use of both the GMT and GST tokens. All of them, though, have distinct functions. GST can be sold to get money, but GMT is used to mint new footwear. According to CoinMarketCap data, there is a limit of 635,468,206 GST on the total number of Green Satoshi Tokens.

Users of the STEP� app must lease or rent sneakers in order to be eligible for prizes. After renting the NFT sneakers, users can jog, walk, or run outside to gain game currency. You can use the game currency in-game or cash it out for a profit.

How Does Green Satoshi Token Work?

One major function of the Green Satoshi Token within the STEP app is as a reward token. The STEP app and the NFT sneakers rented or leased through the app are prerequisites for the incentives. You can earn in-game currency by jogging, walking, or running outdoors after you've rented the NFT sneakers. You can then use this currency in-game or sell it for profit. This is where the Green Satoshi Token comes in handy.

You can play STEP in one of three modes: solo, marathon, or background.

In any of the three ways, users can earn Green Satoshi Tokens as a reward. A player can earn tokens just by moving around in solo mode. Running in marathons is another way for users to earn tokens. Nevertheless, users must register for each marathon race at least 24 hours prior to the start of the event in order to participate.

When the user has a sneaker, whether owned or leased, background mode activates. Even without the STEP app, the mode will be activated. Background mode retrieves the step count from the health data of the mobile device even when the STEP app is not in use.
