What is a Tezos?

Tezos is an open source platform supported by validators, academics, and builders from all over the world. It aims to remove significant obstacles to the adoption of blockchain for assets and applications. The Tezos platform is based on smart contracts.

The native coin of the Tezos blockchain is called XTZ. It is used to connect with decentralised apps (dApps), pay fees, safeguard the network through staking, and provide a simple accounting unit.

The initial coin offering (ICO) of Tezos was conducted in mid 2017. Over the course of two weeks, almost $232 million in Bitcoin (BTC) and Ethereum (ETH) were raised, well exceeding the project's $20 million goal.

Research engineer Arthur Breitman, who formerly worked for Google X and the business Waymo, was the one who first proposed the Tezos blockchain. In September 2014, Breitman published a whitepaper with further details and specifications on the Tezos project.

He claimed that while Tezos offered an on-chain governance approach, Bitcoin's design was flawed and did not provide a highly inclusive governance process. To prevent the network from forking, this would let token holders vote on proposed protocol modifications.
